

A Controversial Issue

It was such a controversial issue regarding Barack Obama being the first black President of the United States. Being black didn't make him less than a man, nor did it make him incapable of holding such a position of that caliber.

Obama didn't say he could not fill the chair of a president, he didn't say "I'm not qualified", or "it's too much work".

What he did say, "It's time for a change, and many changes would be in the best interest of people", and do the best that he can do.

He knew he would face many challenges, but he wasn't afraid. He stepped on in with confidence, velocity, and determination to try and ease the struggles of this economy. I would like to clear the minds of many and inform others of achievements Obama accomplished.

He gave many educational opportunities to those who wanted to acquire loans and grants to further their endeavors, helping veterans to have living accommodations was a priority. He made it possible for veterans and others to have affordable health care insurance, especially those who had no insurance at all, and could not afford the high premiums. More roads and bridges have been constructed, more people are employed.

He gave us hope for a brighter future in spite of the difficulties he faced.

He wore many hats when he was under scrutiny. If it takes a village to raise a child, it should have taken that same village to support President Obama with love and prayers to get him through.

Perfection wasn't expected of him, because no one is perfect. When you have done the best that you can do, that is all one can do. Believing in the power of prayer can get one through many hurdles in life.

Being of a strong mind, overlooking hatred, negativism, insult, insidious rhetoric, action, I think Obama got through.

Let us continue our prayers to help him get through the end of his term and for all of us to come together in a peaceful manner in order to live a peaceful life.
